Collecting consent for processing under the GDPR

Last Modified on Jun 5, 2023

The General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) requires organizations to establish a lawful basis for processing data. A lawful basis for processing means that your organization has a legal right for collecting, storing, or accessing data belonging to a specific person. Often, a lawful basis for processing relies on consent from the Customer. With online scheduling, you may or may not need to obtain consent from Customers who book with you online.

Scheduling is customarily initiated by Customers. By this nature alone, you may not need consent to process information. However, if your organization processes sensitive data, it is recommended that you obtain explicit consent at the time of scheduling. This most likely applies to organizations in the healthcare industry, but other organizations may be affected as well. Data that is considered sensitive includes any information related to racial or ethnic origin, political opinions, religious or philosophical beliefs, trade union memberships, genetic or biometric data, health information, or a person's sex life or sexual orientation. Learn more about establishing a lawful basis for processing

Obtaining consent

The GDPR defines consent as "freely given, specific, informed, and unambiguous indication of the data subject's wishes by which he or she, by a statement or by a clear affirmative action, signifies agreement to the processing of personal data relating to him or her." Controllers that process on the basis of consent must clearly request consent and enable data subjects to withdraw consent at any time. The GDPR also states that if your request for consent occurs in the context of other matters, you should ensure that the request for consent is distinguishable from the other matters.
